

Acknowledgments

This book could not have been completed without the contribution of ideas by and engagement with colleagues. First of all, I would like to thank Ranabir Samaddar and Nasreen Chowdhory for pushing me in the direction of bringing these seemingly disparate ideas together in a coherent framework. I hope I did manage to respond to their criticisms adequately over the years, though of course any remaining errors, omissions or stubborn reiterations are mine. Conversations and debates with Paula Banerjee, Mine Eder, Michele Millard, John Carlaw, Belinda Mumcu, Fulya Girginer, Susan McGrath, Pınar Uyan, Howard Adelman, Derya Ozkul, Galma Akdeniz, Jennifer Hyndman, Galya Ben-Arieh, Turgut Tarhanlı, and Eda Elif Tibet allowed me to rethink different aspects of the Syrian exodus from the perspective of intersectionality and in a decidedly historicized framework. During the four years that it took me to conclude this work, the weekly conversations I had with my human rights class members at York have proven to be a true source of inspiration for me to keep writing. I learned so much from my students' questions, more so than I ever hope to teach. Last but not the least, I owe special thanks to Jonathan Adjemian for working on this text closely and painstakingly, and making sure that individual chapters sufficiently contribute to the overall message of the manuscript. Of course, this text could not have been brought to the light of the sun if it was not Fahri Aral's unforgiving insistence with the clear directive "finish it, now." To him, I owe more than gratitude. If one lacks courage and conviction, nothing is possible. A very special thanks is also due to my publisher Cem Tüzün, who oversaw the entire process with panache and perseverance.
